The N-myc oncogene is an early and critical determinant of normal and malignant cell proliferation in vertebrates. Its expression is tightly regulated; consequently, its dysregulation is likely to be an integral component of the abnormal growth and differentiation of cancer cells. N-myc is an essential regulator of transcription and has a primary role in coordinating the complex early steps of differentiation of neurogenic and lymphoid stem cells. N-myc interacts with multiple components of the cell cycle machinery, including essential cyclins, cyclin-dependent kinases, and p53. These interactions appear to modulate the action of N-myc and permit the p53 tumor suppressor to restrict the inappropriate cell growth that can follow N-myc overexpression. In some cases, these interactions appear to enhance the mitogenic activity of N-myc. This review discusses the association of the N-myc protein with the cell cycle, the putative roles of the N-myc protein, and the strategies that might be used to exploit these associations for the development of strategies to combat cancer.

Q: Confused about how this 2 bit up-counter will overflow I've been reading a book (called "Turing Machines, Computability and undecidability" - by Steve Cook) and in the book they explain how to implement a 2 bit up-counter using standard multiplication, addition and multi-shift. In the book they wrote that the following expression will overflow:
$$C_1 = 2 * ((1 \text{ e}^{79\text{caf}774\text{b}})$$

Q: How to write the "one of" structure in Frege The following code compiles in Haskell: Prelude> 1 `elem` (1:2:3:4) True and yields True as output, but Prelude> 1 `elem` [1,2,3,4] False does not yield False as output, because the compiler throws an exception when trying to pattern match [1,2,3,4] the constant function is applied to the constant 1 which is not 1. The question is how the compiler can detect that 1 is not a constant, and can
