Create your own Space Marine

Abandon the complacent complacency of millennia in the endless role-playing games of mediocrity of your particular fantasy, thereby abandoning swords, sorcery, and "mythic heroes" in favor of generators that spit out random Space Marines. Grow a massive mutated mass of robo-slime and give them as many guns as possible. Throw them into purgatory until that tool's mood improves. If it lasts long enough, maybe it will even let you insert a bunch of freeform sci-fi components, too. See? This isn't just a straight up third-person shooter - it's something significant, something bigger, something more. Yes, yes, it could potentially be a gigantic answer to your primal urge to feel like a real Space Marine, a legion of faceless warriors across space and time at your command, with none of the attendant headaches or long-term investment. This is the real deal. It's happening right now. Let's get it started!

Welcome to Windfall!

Windfall is a class-driven, skill-based, mission-based shooter of the most modern kind, fast-paced, automatic-sequenced gameplay, layered with a large ensemble cast of characters with their own unique styles and abilities. You will also get access to a detailed level editor once the final version launches! It's all customizable. You will be able to wear you own clothes and weapons, be it a metal suit or a plasteel one. You can also specify your own skill tree and weapons, so you get to create your own unique look and superlative abilities.

Features:

- 8 intense missions split into 2 campaigns with dedicated player skill progression
- 32 brutal melee and ranged combat tactics
- Over 20 original voice acted characters, each with

What's new:

Some deeds go beyond what should be. When they reach several centuries long they form a race of their own. A race to run the fastest to win the race that will be remembered forever. Something nobody can continue forever. Yet that is exactly what happened to the longest continuously run pure speed race before Antibes France 2000. In 1867, a young Frenchman joined the first pure speed clock racing. He was named Paulin Paris, and later on Timmermannsdorf. Together with many gifted riders they were successful in battling on several city streets against the clock. Among them Arthur Moinet who was also famous for his bicycle painting, studies and history. The group loved fast cycling and they raced only on machines in a low gear to get the maximum speed possible with the gear they knew. Times did not matter. It was much more important to outrun the clock. They weren't bringing backs while riding. No. It was all about winning in the absolute limit. The Travaux Publics de Champs de Boulogne is in its sixth season. With 190 official sections where professionals and a handful of amateurs like us race in all directions all day and night on the streets of Boulogne, it's a battle of endurance. With over 1,000 riders starting off for a chance to win their title and compete in national and international level events like the UCI half and full races. Phil of The Kerotype grabbing a break With over 37 riders racing one week and totally ripping it apart the next, The Kerotype is just about everywhere. One minute shivering in the cold for a turn of UCI level competition, the next with the racers folding from two to five in addition to the normal race for six while their legs just can't take on the injury from the previous night's heavy events. Yet they train tirelessly. What more can you ask for? To compare, most of the world's known sprint riders are able to maintain their form year to year with very little effort, while the top cyclocross riders in the world have to train 2 to 3 times a week. And then there are the most hard core commuters who push themselves in constant pursuit of their limited training time. All this at their own expense. On top of that, sometimes four to five events a week. Of course they also often race on weekends with cross, mountain biking and all-mountain approaches, or spend a ton of time

FAQ: About: I would like to create a bigger environment. The character is currently too small and standing on top of an object is a bit unstable, especially during Sprint.

Gameplay: I would like the player to run to an NPC on the other side of the map, starting at the first wall. Because I would like to start out directly, I would also like that the player takes a bit of time to get to the NPC.

Character: What would you like to change about the character?

Audio: What would you like to change in sound?

Interface: What would you like to see change in the interface? Thanks.
