I have implemented a templating system for my web pages and like all such systems, when a user requests the page, the page is loaded into a new window. It is my understanding that that's not a problem, since the master page is loaded into the current window. My templating system has several settings that are encoded in the URL of the page, and that I do not want to be encoded into the URL of the master page. In the window.onload event I would like to get the parameters of the window calling my web page, which is in the current window, then and only then do I want to call a method that replaces the values of the parameters. Is that possible? A: My templating system has several settings that are encoded in the URL of the page, and that I do not want to be encoded into the URL of the master page. This is like I said. You need to send the values to the master. If you use a common parent, then this is quite easy. The code to send the values will be

MsInstaller.Application /qb /norestart /Passive /norestart Â·Q: How to populate array using multiple cores on matlab I have a large matrix that I'm using CPU to fill in (i.e. a lot of loops, no matlab's parallel functionality). Now I want to fill a separate matrix "offsets" with the same values in each row of the large matrix. Is there an efficient way of doing this, or is it best to just spawn more cores? A: You should try `parallTask` which is included in Parallel Computing Toolbox in Matlab. From the documentation : `parallTask` is a task that can be distributed across the available computational resources. Its typical usage is in the case when you first need to launch a task on all available computational resources and then you close the application and leave its control to matlab. Whenever you open it later, the task will be resumed and the progress reported to the screen. In fact all the main matlab GUI elements will work as usual.

Millisecond Pulsed Electron Paramagnetic Resonance Imaging of Single Organelles at High Magnetic Fields. Coherence-selected EPR imaging at high magnetic fields is a promising technique for high-resolution imaging of small organs, such as biological samples, single cells, and red blood cells. For other applications, the achievable spatial resolution is relatively low. Here we demonstrate higher spatial resolution by combining high-field techniques with pulsed magnetic field gradients that induce motion in the polarizable sample. We show that higher spatial resolution of ~ 30 nm is obtained. Moreover, millisecond electron paramagnetic resonance (EPR) acquisitions permit comprehensive mapping of single nano-objects. To illustrate these two applications, the lipid bilayer

in an oriented membrane fraction of bacillariophyte Alcaligenes eutrophus was imaged using continuous-wave spectroscopy. Electron paramagnetic
