The mechanism whereby cell death induced by plant hormones such as phytohormones and defense-related plant signals is regulated is poorly understood. Changes in cell volume are often associated with programmed cell death and are induced by plant hormones, such as the phytohormone ethylene. We have identified a fragment of the tobacco mosaic virus (TMV) genome that encodes a coding region required to restore the cell volume-dependent death phenotype of a transgenic line of Nicotiana attenuata expressing a non-cell-autonomous mutant of the ethylene-insensitive receptor ETR2. Deletion of the transgene restores the wild-type cell death phenotype. Our results suggest that the cell death response to a number of plant hormones involves the participation of a viral gene product that impinges upon a non-cell-autonomous signaling pathway.Q:
