You can sit at a table and sip the stuff, you can read endless passages on a bottle, you can make a pilgrimage to the one-of-a-kind farmhouse cellar that has the best vintages on earth, but there's also a way to learn about wine that is different: listen to people who've spent their lives trying to learn the stuff. To grow up in a country with a long tradition of wine-making and experiencing viniculture firsthand. To explore the land, find the right grapes, the right place for the wine to flourish, the right techniques for that, the right cooper who could make it, in short, the right wine. It's this experience of harvest season that people are trying to explain to me, and every time that I hear it they're hearing it for the first time. The Master of Wine Michael Broadbent has been doing this for so long that there is simply no way to match the experience that he has been having for the last 65 years in order to understand what is happening around here. You can't keep learning about wine and the grape vines and the vineyard to the point of marginal exhaustion. You need to know it, but you also have to let it go, so that you can actually live your life. Yet, Michael still has so much to say. He says things like "I don't really see the difference between red and white wines" and "The Mediterranean grows great red grapes, but I don't think it is a wine-growing area", and he says things that you simply can't say unless you've been there c6a93da74d
