I'd wager that if you had an amateur 640x480 4Mb image on a HD disc, you'd d/l the free Lightroom 3 and start converting it to a much higher resolution 640x480 4Mb image file. So I had a hard time with the price tag. A lower-res image file takes up less space. I had to check the program out for all potential features anyway. With its free 60 day trial, I purchased Lightroom 2 in a heartbeat. Using Lightroom to process my files has been a joy. I literally don't have to touch my camera at all; just sit back and use my computer to perform a majority of image manipulations. The one thing that does separate Lightroom from the competition is being able to provide editing for multiple RAW and JPEG image formats. In addition, the integrated XML workflow store allows you to export your images into PhotoShelter, DropBox, and Flickr. I must confess that Lightroom feels a bit under-powered at times, for example, when editing RAW files. For example, when I try to process my images while windowed, it lags. It doesn't happen when I have two or more open windows. I'm not sure if it's because of the size of my RAM or just the load currently affecting the program. It could be that Lightroom is doing something more complex than what I can handle. It certainly doesn't take the final step of editing for image adjustment. In addition, I have a few complaints with the new version of Lightroom : conversions lack adjustable sharpness controls. You can use Lightroom to warpsize your image, but it makes a square image. Another thing is that Lightroom doesn't log in to my Dropbox folder to access the images. DropBox appears to be a decent program, but it is not on par with Lightroom. It's possible that Lightroom simply doesn't support the more advanced synchronization mechanisms. Lightroom also doesn't have an easy way to quickly select multiple images and convert them individually. This can be a deal breaker if you are processing a large number of images. Automation is ok, but it can't match the power of simple mouse clicks.
