Simple Startup Manager Crack For PC

The first problem I noticed was that the application wasn't quite stable on Windows 7. It gave me an error at some point about "DLL Not Found." I only found out about it when I went to uninstall the tool from Control Panel. As it turned out, this was no bug. In the past, the program was written to work on Windows 2000 (I'm not sure which version of .NET Framework it originally used), and this one failed to work on newer OSes, which is why it wasn't installed on Windows 7 or Windows 8. Other than that, though, the program is very easy to use. It's got a menu bar at the top that looks like this: On the left, you'll see the list of autorun programs. You can click on each one to view its details, disable it (for example, you can prevent a program from running every time you turn on your computer), as well as view its location in the Windows registry, or launch it using Explorer. On the right side, you'll see another list that shows all the applications that currently start up automatically. You can right-click one of them to open a context menu, and perform some common operations, like disable the app, disable it for current user, disable it for all users, delete the entry from this list, move the app to the Current User or All Users folder (so the user will be able to launch it in the future), as well as view its location in Explorer, where you can delete it. The biggest problem with the tool, though, is that it doesn't offer any means of adding new items to the startup list. It should come with some kind of settings or configuration manager, and you could easily write your own that would give you a more powerful interface. The program is 100% free to download and use, and it's easy to install. It's a simple, and easy-to-use program, which will keep you from having to deal with startup programs manually. What I like most about the tool is the unobtrusive way it offers to get rid of programs that don't play well with other apps. As I said, though, it doesn't allow you to add new apps to the startup lineup.
